

Racial discrimination in the community Short guide to assisting parents, families and carers

Australia's diversity and multiculturalism is a sign of its strength, and source of pride. Despite this, one in five Australians experience racially-based discrimination within the community.<sup>1</sup>

As such, from time to time school staff may find themselves in a position of providing support or guidance to students and families about this issue. This quick guide is designed to assist school staff to inform families of where they can get specialised advice and support.

For specialised advice and to lodge a complaint regarding racial discrimination, contact:

General tips and suggestions for families:

NOTE: Important to notify Supervisors, Year Level Coordinators, Assistant Principals, Principals, and/or Wellbeing teams, as well as refer to relevant internal policies and procedures, regarding any requests for support regarding racism and discrimination.

- For all serious incidents of racism, encourage family members to notify their local police station. If their immediate safety is at risk, encourage them to contact 000.
- For all clear-cut, or potential incidents of discrimination, encourage family members to contact VEOHRC.
- Suggest making a record of all incidents and interactions include the date, time, location, who was involved, description of what happened, witnesses, and any responses or follow up to date.
- Encourage arrangement of a support person to assist them through any follow up such as a supportive family member, colleague, friend, support worker, or community member.
- Inform them that all organisations public, private and governmental are bound by the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 and thus should have processes in place for responding to incidents of racism and discrimination. Where possible and if safe to do so, it is preferable to express concerns or lodge a complaint with the organisation in which the incident occurred directly. The following table provides suggestions and options of who to contact within specific organisations or contexts.
